BIRDWATCHING

CORUMBÁ - CAPITAL OF THE PANTANAL

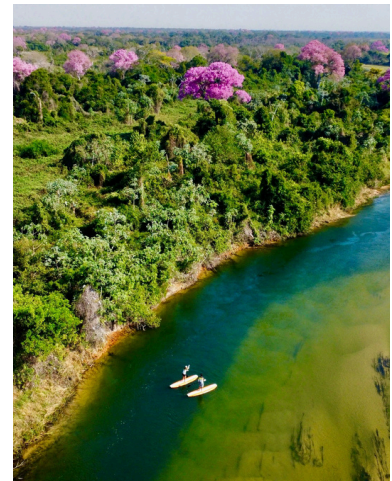

Corumbá

CAPITAL OF THE PANTANAL

Corumbá holds most of the Brazilian Pantanal. It's that simple. With a territory of over 64,000 km², the municipality covers around 40% of the entire Pantanal biome – and that makes a real difference for birders.

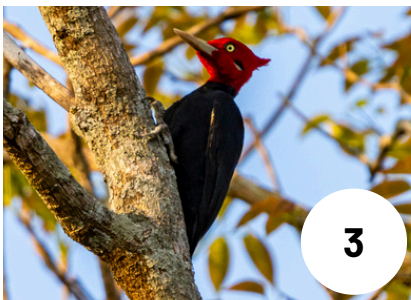

Our location on the Bolivian border is more than a geographic detail. It means that within a few kilometers you move between completely different ecosystems. We leave the classic Pantanal floodplain – the one in the photographs, with flooded grasslands and forest islands – and reach Chaco habitats and the Chiquitano dry forests that cover the region's hills. Distinct landscapes, with distinct birds. In a single day you can log typical wetland species in the morning and, in the afternoon, find birds of dry, rocky habitats. Such concentrated diversity is rare.

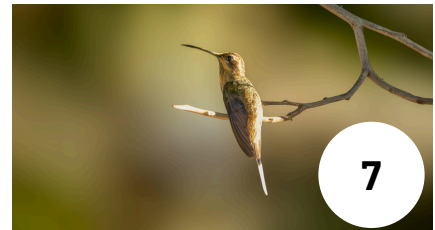

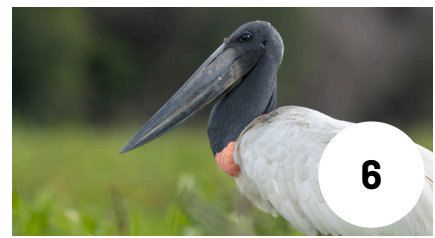

As for the best time to visit: there is no single answer, because the Pantanal works in cycles. During the floods, waterbirds gather in certain areas and become easier to see. In the dry season, the fields open up and other species appear. Migrations follow their own calendar, too, and some birds are only seen in certain months. In short, each season offers different sightings – not better or worse ones. We have guided groups in January and in August, and both left with completely different, yet equally rich, lists and experiences.

Corumbá is, without doubt, one of the most authentic spots in the Pantanal. Here, wildlife still sets the pace, which is exactly what makes every outing unpredictable and genuine.
